P R E F A C E.

THIS work, the result of the labours of many years, is designed to supply a full and complete pronouncing, etymological, and explanatory Dictionary of the English Language, containing an unusual number of scientific, technical, and other terms, in a handy form for general reference, and at such a price as will put it within the reach of persons of the most moderate means. Many new and important features will be found in the work.

The Dictionary Words.—These are printed in a bold, black type, and in single letters, that being the form in which words are usually presented to the reader. Capital letters begin such words only as proper names, and others which are always so printed. This distinction will be of considerable use to the learner. English phrases, familiar colloquialisms, and slang and other terms useful for reference by the general reader, have been freely inserted and defined. The addition of participial terminations will be found a useful feature.

The Grouping of Words.—The Dictionary words are grouped under a leading word, from which they may be presumed naturally to fall or be formed, or simply follow in alphabetical order. Only, however, are they so grouped when they are derived from the same leading root, and when their alphabetical order may not be materially disturbed. When words occur in a group out of their alphabetical order, they will also be found in their place with a simple reference to the heading under which they are grouped. Care has been taken not to group to such an extent as to create difficulty in consulting the work, but the alphabetical order of words in respect of their terminal letters is in no case attended to in the grouping. The plan of grouping will be found to have important advantages. The words the most nearly related are immediately presented to the eye in a bold, black type, and not scattered over several pages, merely because their terminal letters are different.

The Pronunciation.—The Dictionary words, for pronunciation, are respelt phonetically with italic letters, and divided into syllables by dots instead of hyphens, and accented. The pronunciation has been carefully revised, in conformity with the best modern usage, by the Rev. P. H. Phelps, M.A. Cantab., to whom the Author has also to acknowledge his great obligations for very valuable assistance he has afforded in other departments of the work. The scheme of phonotypes or sound-symbols is fully detailed in a Table at the beginning of the work, and again briefly repeated, for the convenience of reference, at the bottom of each two consecutive pages. The leading word of each group is uniformly respelt and marked in full; but the succeeding ones, especially when the seat of the accent is the same, have, generally, only the terminal parts respelt, the full respelling of the leading word being sufficient to indicate the first part.

The Etymology of Words.—For the roots, or the supposed roots, enclosed within brackets, the works of the best and most recent authorities have been carefully consulted. In the words given as derived from the non-classical languages—that is, not from the Latin and Greek—Wedgwood, Latham, and Max Müller have been generally followed. When a Latin or Greek noun is given as a root-word, the genitive case is frequently added in order to exhibit the literal elements more prominently to the learner. For the same reason, in Latin verbs, the supine in um is often preferred to the infinitive in re. It must not be supposed that all the root-words given within the brackets indicate really the ultimate sources of the English words. In a very large class of English words they really are so, as in scientific terms, and words directly derived from the Latin or Greek, or in the case of that large class which are merely imitative of natural sounds or natural appearances. The root-words are meant to show—(1) the probable origin of the English words; (2) their primary meanings; or, (3) their equivalents in other languages. The root-words may be considered as a core for a group of related English words. Apart from this their chief use in an educational point of view, their meanings will be found highly useful in enabling the general reader to ascertain, in most cases, without difficulty, the primary significations of the English words. When no meaning is attached to a root-word, it is to be considered as an analogue—that is, it has the same sense as the leading Dictionary word. In regard to a numerous class of English words usually considered as derived from the literary Latin, or from the Latin through the French, Italian, or Spanish, the best authorities now teach precisely the opposite. Such words are really derived from some one of that large class of related European languages called the ROMANCE, including the French, Italian, and Spanish; or from a source common not only to them, but also to English and literary Latin. Literary or classical Latin had its origin in the unwritten languages and dialects of Italy. When the former ceased to be a living tongue, the latter still survived. In the same way, the present substratum of literary English has not sprung from the Anglo-Saxon of Wessex only, but from it and the languages and dialects, however derived, spoken in every part of Great Britain. While these facts must be distinctly borne in mind by the student, it is convenient to retain the fiction of derivation from or through the literary Latin in regard to the classes of words referred to. In this view, the exact equivalents of English words in Italian, French, or Spanish, will be found highly useful and significant.

It will be observed in numerous instances that successive entries occur of words spelt precisely in the same way, and that they are so entered because they are derived from different roots, and have, of course, different significations. This fact of itself will afford a striking example of the advantage of having related words grouped under their common root-words, instead of the usual plan of English Dictionaries of having the most contradictory senses placed under the same word which itself, in two, three, or more of these senses, has quite a different origin, though spelt in the same way.

The Meanings.—The meanings of the words are those usually given, but they have been simplified as much as possible. In the way of definition there will be found, however, a vast quantity of entirely new matter. The separate entries made, in works of the same kind, to indicate distinctions in the significations of verbs, when used transitively and intransitively, have been abandoned, as confusing to the learner, and as practically useless; at the same time, however, the distinctions themselves have generally been retained. No attempt has been made to render the definitions exhaustive; yet in these the work is very full. Very frequently words in a group ending in nes, ble, and bly, especially the last, are not followed by definitions. When so found, the meanings are easily formed: Thus, distinctness, state of being distinct; distinctly, in a distinct manner; bleakness, state of being bleak; bleakly, in a bleak manner; improvable, that may be improved; improvably, in an improvable manner; improvableness, state of being improvable: Thus, ble, meaning “that may be;” bly, manner; and ness, state of being.

The Appendices.—They are—a note in regard to prefixes being placed first—(1) A full list of postfixes in alphabetical order, having their origin indicated, and followed by examples of their use; (2) A list of common abbreviations, with their meanings, and their full uncontracted forms, when not English, within brackets; (3) A very full list of Latin, French, and other phrases, the name of the language, and their signification in English.

Concluding Remarks.—Such is a brief outline of the nature and contents of the present work. In a work necessitating so great an amount of research, and the elaboration of so great a mass of matter from such a variety of sources during the unremitting labour of many years, there cannot but occur matter and arrangement that may call for adverse criticism, or at least call forth difference of opinion. Where, too, there is such a variety of type, symbols, and marks employed, and so many elaborate details, errors may occur. It is believed, however, that these will be found but few in number, and of little importance. Besides the Rev. Mr Phelps, already referred to, highly-qualified gentlemen were engaged on the revision of the proof-sheets as they were passing through the press. The Author begs to acknowledge his obligations to those gentlemen for their important services. Dr Page, Professor of Geology in the Durham University of Physical Science, Newcastle, and author of well-known works on Geology and Physical Geography, specially attended to the correctness of the numerous scientific terms introduced into the work.

To give a list of authorities used in compiling the present work would serve no good end. Suffice it to say that numerous works have been diligently consulted and compared, including the best and most recent authorities. While the Author's field of review has been a very extensive one, and while he has of necessity trodden a path common to authors of works of the same kind, it is hoped that no undue use of materials from other works has been made. The most laborious care has been employed, and considerable expense incurred, in securing accuracy. The Author trusts that this work will secure public approbation, and fulfil, in the opinion of those best able to judge, the objects for which it is chiefly designed.

EDINBURGH, October 1871.

NOTE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

In this Edition a considerable number of important corrections have been introduced into the body of the work. A Supplement and a List of Proper Names have also been added. The Supplement contains about 450 additional words—chiefly such new scientific and other words as are now becoming current in our popular literature. Several emendations referring to the body of the work, and new explanatory matter, have also been inserted in the Supplement. The List of Proper Names consists of (1) Scripture proper names taken afresh from the authorised version, (2) all the proper names found in the Apocrypha, (3) common classical names, and (4) common historical and other names—all respect for pronunciation according to the method employed in the Dictionary. In placing the accent, the authority of Smart and Dr Smith has been followed—chiefly the latter. In re-spelling the proper names, and employing the sound-symbols used in the Dictionary, a distinctness and precision have been given to the pronunciation of them never before attempted. Dr Page and the Rev. Mr Phelps have carefully read over the Supplement. Mr Phelps, and two other gentlemen well known in the literary world, kindly took the trouble carefully to go over the List of Proper Names, and adapt their pronunciation to English usage. It will be observed, however, that though the pronunciation according to English idiom and usage has been preferred, the strictly classical has been sufficiently often indicated. It is hoped that, with these improvements and additions, this work will not only maintain the high position which it has already attained, but find increasing favour with the general public.

SCHEME OF PHONOTYPES OR SOUND-SYMBOLS

FOR THE

PRONUNCIATION OF WORDS.

Note.—{ } is the mark dividing words respelt phonetically into syllables; ('), the accent indicating on which syllable or syllables the accent or stress of the voice is to be placed. The marks (^) and (~) above the vowels are to be understood as having relation to the character of the sound alone, not to the prolongation, or the reverse, of the sound—that is determined in ordinary cases by the accentuation of the word. The mark (~) above the symbols āw, ōw, ōō, and ōy, designates these as diphthongal sounds.

ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, AND REFERENCE BOOK.

ABEL

A, a, the first letter of the alphabet in most languages; an adjective of number, signifying one; the indefinite article—used before adjectives or nouns that begin with a consonant or with the sound of a consonant; an Anglo-Saxon prefix signifying at, to, in, or on; a Greek prefix, also its form an, signifying without, not; a Latin prefix, with its forms ab and abs, signifying from or away.

A.1, a one, a mark to denote a ship of the first class as to newness and being seaworthy.

Aaronic, a. a-rôn'ik; also Aaronical, a. a-rôn'ik-kál, of or pert. to Aaron or his priesthood.

ab, ab, a Latin prefix; also a and abs, signifying from or away.

A.B., first letters of Artium Baccalaureus—ár'shí-tím, of arts; bák'ká-láw'ri-tús, bachelor—meaning Bachelor of Arts, an academic title.

aback, ad. á-bák' (AS. on-bac), on the back; backwards, as used by sailors; by surprise; unexpectedly.

abacus, n. áb-á-kús (L., from Gr. abakos, a board for calculations), a counting frame; in arch., the crowning table of a column.

Abaddon, n. á-bád-dôn (Heb. abad, to be lost or destroyed), the destroying angel of the bottomless pit.

abaft, ad., prep. á-báft' (AS. aftan, after, behind), a seaman's term; at or towards the stern or hinder part of a ship; behind.

abandon, v. á-bán-dún (F. abandonner, to desert), to give up; to desert; to forsake entirely; aban'doning, imp.: aban'doned, pp.: adj., wholly forsaken; given up; extremely profligate or corrupt; aban'donment, n. a giving up wholly; a total desertion; aban'doner, n. the person who gives up.

abase, v. á-bás' (F. abaisser, to lower—from L. ad; basis, the foot or base), to bring low; to degrade; to cast down: aba'sing, imp.: abased, pp. á-bást': abatement, n. the act of humbling or bringing low.

abash, v. á-básh' (old F. esbahir, to set agape, to confound), to confuse with guilt; to make ashamed: abashing, imp.: abashed, pp. á-básh', confounded; put to silence: abash'ment, n. confusion from shame.

abate, v. á-bát' (F. abattre, to beat down: It. abbattere, to overthrow), to lessen; to lower in price; to grow less; to subside: aba'ting, imp.: abated, pp.: abat-able, a. á-bá'tá-bí, that can be lessened or abated: abatement, n. a reduction; a lessening; the sum abated: aba'ter, n. the person or thing that abates.

abatis, n. áb-á-tis or ab-á-té, also spelt abattis (F. abattre, to beat down), piles of trees or their larger branches, with sharpened points outward, laid down for the protection of troops.

abattoir, n. áb-at-wáir' (F.), a public slaughter-house.

abb, n. áb (AS.), the yarn of a weaver's warp.

abba, n. áb-bá (Chaldee), a father; a name given in the East to church dignitaries—hence baba, papa, pope; abbacy, n. áb-bá-sí, the dignity or rights and privileges of an abbot; abbatial, a. á-bá'shí-ál; also abbatical, a. bá'tí-kál, of an abbey: ab'be, n. áb-bé, a father; a title of courtesy or honour given to persons in many Catholic countries who have given themselves to the study of divinity: abbess, n. áb-bés, a lady placed over a nunnery. Among persons living secluded from the world in religious houses, the males are called monks, and the females nuns. The residence of a monk is called a monastery, and that of a nun a nunnery. abbey, n. áb-bí, plu. abbeys, áb-bíz, a monastery; a residence of persons secluded from the world, either male or female; abbot, n. áb-bút, the superior or chief person over an abbey or monastery: ab'bot-ship, n. the office of an abbot.

Abbeville flints, áb-vél, rude flint implements, in the form of spear-heads, &c., found in great abundance in the post-tertiary sands and gravels of the river Somme, near Abbeville, in France.

abbreviate, v. áb-bré-ví-at (L. ab; brevis, short), to shorten; to reduce to a smaller size; to abridge: abbrevia'ting, imp.: abbrevia'ted, pp.: abbrevia-tion, n. áb-bré-ví-á'shún, the act of shortening; a part of a word used for the whole: abbrevia'tor, n. one who: abbreviatory, a. -tór'í, shortening: abbrevia-ture, n. -ví-á-túr', an abbreviation.

abdicare, v. áb-dí-kát (L. ab; dico, I proclaim or make known), to give up a right; to renounce an office of power: ab'dica'ting, imp.: ab'dica'ted, pp.: abdi-cation, n. áb-dí-ká'shún, the act of giving up; a surrendering: ab'dicant, n. -kánt, also ab'dica'tor, -ká-tór, one who: abdicative, a. áb-dí-ká'tív, causing or implying abdication.

abdomen, n. áb-dó-mén (L., from abdo, I conceal), the lower part of the belly: abdominal, a. áb-dóm'í-nál, belonging to the lower belly: abdominous, a. áb-dóm'í-nús, having a large belly: abdominales, n. plu. áb-dóm'í-ná'léz, in zool., the soft-finned fishes which have their ventral fins placed on the abdomen, behind the pectorals.

abduce, v. áb-dús'; also abduct, v. áb-dúkt' (L. ab; duco, I lead), to lead or draw from; to separate: abduc'ing, imp.: abduced, pp. áb-dús': abduc'ting, imp.: abducted, pp.: abductor, n. one who; in anat., a muscle that draws a limb or a part outwards: abduction, n. áb-dúkt'shún, in med., a drawing away from; a carrying away by fraud or open violence: abducent, a. áb-dú-sént, separating; drawing back.

abad, ad. á-béd' (AS.), on or in bed.
abele, n. á-bé-lé (Pol. biało, white), the white poplar-tree.

máte, máf, fár, láw; mête, mêt, hér; pine, pín; nôle, nôt, móve; ców, bów, fót; páre, búd; chair, game, jog, shun, thing, there, zeal.

aberration, n. ab-ér-rá-shùn (L. ab; erro, I wander), a wandering from the right way, as from truth; moral perversity; mental weakness; an apparent motion of the fixed stars; aberrant, a. ab-ér-ránt, differing widely; aberrant, a. ab-ér-ránt; aberrance, n. ab-ér-ráns; also aberrancy, n. ab-ér-rán-si, a wandering from the right way.

abet, v. a-bét (AS. old F. abetter, to incite; abouta, to set dogs on), to aid; to incite; to encourage, chiefly in a bad sense; abetting, imp. abet-ted, pp. abet-tor, n. one who abets or encourages, usually in a bad sense; abetment, n.

abeyance, n. a-bá-áns (F. abayer, to gape at, to pant after), state of being held back for a time; state of expectancy; temporary suppression.

abhor, v. ab-hór (L. ab; horreo, I shake or look terrible), to hate very much; to despise; to detest; abhorring, imp. ab-horred, pp. ab-horred; abhorrence, n. ab-hór-réns, very great hatred; abhorrer, n. the person who abhors; abhorrent, a. ab-hór-rént, hating; detesting; odious; repugnant to: abhorrently, ad. -ly.

Abib, n. a-bíb (Heb. ab, swelling, protuberant), the first month of the Jewish year; also called Nisan.

abide, v. a-bid (AS. abidan; Goth. beidan, to expect), to remain; to continue; to rest; to be firm; abiding, imp. abode, a-bód, pp. abider, n. a-bí-der, one who: abidingly, ad. -ly.

abietites, n. plu. a-bí-é-tí-téz, or -tits (L. abies, the fir-tree), a genus of fossil fir cones, which are often found in great perfection in the Wealden and lower green-sand; abietic, a. ab-é-tík, pert. to the fir-tree; ability, n. a-bí-lít (L. habilitas, fitness or aptitude—from habeo, I have; F. habiller, to dress), power to do, whether with the body or mind—opposed to capacity, power to receive; aptitude; skill; legal right to do—in this sense the opposite is disability: abilities, plu. a-bí-lít-téz, mental endowments.

abject, a. ab-jékt (L. abjectus, downcast—from ab; jactus, throw; or cast), cast down; worthless; mean; without hope: abjectly, ad. -ly; abjection, n. ab-jék-shùn; also abjectness, n.; and abjectness, a. mean or low state; meanness of spirit.

abjure, v. ab-jór (L. ab; juro, I swear), to deny or renounce upon oath; to renounce with solemnity; abjured, pp. ab-jóred, pp. ab-jóred; abjuration, n. ab-jóo-rá-shùn, renouncing upon oath; abjuror, n. one who denies upon oath: abjuratory, a. -i, containing abjuration.

ab lactation, n. ab-láctá-tá-shùn (L. ab; lacto, I suckle), the weaning of a child from the breast; a method of ingrafting, now called inarching.

ablative, n. ab-lá-tív (L. ab; latus, carried), name of a case in Latin nouns, in which the actions of carrying away or taking from are signified: ablation, n. ab-lá-shùn, a taking away.

able, a. á-bl (see under ability), having sufficient power to do; qualified; skillful; fitted for: ably, ad. á-bl; ableness, n. á-bl-nés; able-bodied, ad. having a sound strong body; able to work.

ablution, n. ab-lú-shùn (L. ab; luo, I wash), a washing, cleansing, or purification by water: abluent, a. ab-lú-ént, cleansing by liquids: n. an attenuant or purifier.

As derived from the English verb connect and the Latin necto, the spelling connection should be preferred to that of connexion. If, however, both forms are preserved, their application ought to be restricted, and they ought not to be made identical in signification. As suggested by Dr Latham, the form (1) connection should be used when a link or bond of union is meant; and (2) connexion when the object which is linked is signified—thus (1) connection, n. kón-nék'shún, state of being fastened together; act of fastening together; junction by an intervening substance or medium; just relation to something precedent or subsequent; coherence: (2) connexion, n. kón-nék'shún, a relation by marriage or blood; a religious sect or communion; circle of persons with whom any one is in contact.
